WORKPLACE INSPECTIONS

Regular workplace inspections are a critical component of a successful health and safety program. Employers are obligated by law to inform workers of the potential and actual workplace hazards, which can be identified through the workplace inspection process. By conducting effective workplace inspections, hazards can be identified and controlled before workers are harmed.

However, the workplace inspection process must not only identify hazards, it must also ensure existing health and safety standards and procedures are effective, and control measures are adequate. Recommendations are then usually made for ongoing health and safety improvements in the workplace. Individuals conducting workplace inspections and making effective, valuable recommendations must be knowledgeable and well informed to do so.
